Why study classics and ancient history at Bristol?

Classics and ancient history involve the study of ancient Greece and Rome, and their reception by later cultures.

At Bristol, not only do we offer the full range of traditional subjects, but we also challenge our students to decide for themselves what the classics mean for them in this culture and at this time. Topics range from ancient Greek and Latin language units at all levels to historical and cultural surveys and highly specialised seminar subjects.

Moreover, all of our courses give you the opportunity to choose optional units, some of which may be taken outside the department. For example you may choose to study post-classical art history or politics, Sanskrit or Italian, or dozens of other topics across the University.

Whatever you choose, our strong staff-student ratio means that you will receive plenty of help in developing your own well-informed and sophisticated ideas. Many units involve small-group work and all our third-year units are taught in small-group seminars.

‘Three years at Bristol developed my leadership skills in various ways, showing me the importance of analytical thinking and having the confidence to commit to decisions. It also encouraged openness to new ideas, the ability to formulate arguments and build consensus, as well as identifying clear steps to reach your goals. It helped me to develop the ability to work with others, think clearly and communicate effectively.’

This leaflet contains information for students planning to start university in autumn 2019. We have made every effort to ensure all details are correct at the time of going to press (June 2018). However, since this information is subject to change, you are advised to check the University's website, bristol.ac.uk/ug-study, for the latest updates.

What will you study?

Whichever course you choose, you will take four core units and two optional units for each of your first two years. One of the optional units must be taken somewhere in the department, while the other may be taken anywhere in the University.

In Classical Studies you focus on Greek and Roman art, myth, literature, and the history of their reception. This course aims to help you develop sophisticated new ways of interpreting and enjoying both ancient and modern culture. A typical core unit is Myth, in which you learn a variety of theories for discovering the deep meanings of a mythical text, such as the Homeric Hymn to Demeter. You may choose to learn an ancient language.

In Classics you concentrate on Greek and Latin language and literature. You will be allocated to appropriate Greek and Latin classes based on your previous experience. No previous knowledge is required; however, students without experience of Greek or Latin should be able to demonstrate an aptitude for other foreign languages. With the exception of introductory units, all students combine language acquisition with literary, historical or philosophical interpretation. A typical core unit is Catullus and Horace, in which you read selected poems by the two Roman authors, study their poetic techniques, learn how they adapted previous Greek and Latin literary traditions and, on this basis, develop your own interpretations.

In Ancient History you explore the Greek and Roman world, the sources of information available, and the different interpretive approaches employed by ancient and modern historians. Some units will focus on teaching you how to find and interpret evidence, while others concentrate on core periods in Greek and Roman political and cultural history, such as the Hellenistic period or Late Antiquity. You may also choose to learn an ancient language.

In the third year of all courses students take seminar units on special topics related to staff research interests. With the aid of a staff supervisor you will research and write a dissertation on a subject of your choice. You will also take Applied Classics, an innovative unit in which you will work as part of a group to identify, plan, market and execute a project aimed at presenting the ancient world to the wider public. Those studying ancient languages may continue them during the third year; students on the Classics degree must continue with at least one language.

Teaching methods for all courses vary by unit, but most students will encounter a combination of small discussion seminars (ten to 20 students), language instruction (ten to 30 students) and large lectures (40 to 100 students). We encourage you to attend regular one-on-one tutorials for essay feedback and discussion of your progress. You will encounter a variety of assessment, including portfolios, essays and exams. You will also have the opportunity to give and receive feedback on oral presentations. The assessments will allow you to demonstrate your subject-specific knowledge and expertise and to develop key critical and communication skills to prepare you for life as a graduate.

'I will always have an interest in the ancient world and the course has provided me with vital skills such as writing, independent research and structuring an argument.'

Careers and graduate destinations

The skills that arts students traditionally bring to the workplace are valued in every part of the employment market. Arts students go on to succeed in careers as diverse as the subjects they study here – commerce, tech start-ups, law, accountancy, theatre, museums, publishing, the charity sector, journalism, politics, education and international relations, as well as sectors not immediately associated with arts disciplines, such as engineering and IT.

Graduates from the Department of Classics and Ancient History go on to careers in law, finance and commerce, management, journalism, the civil service, teaching, the media, and many other areas.

All of our courses aim to teach a wide variety of analytical and communicative skills, which are valued by employers in many fields. For example you will learn to write correctly and develop your sense of style; you will improve your ability to synthesise complex sources of information, draw judicious conclusions and present those conclusions clearly; and you will expand your capacity to construct sophisticated and persuasive arguments in writing and in conversation. We have close contact with the Careers Service so that you benefit from further training and advice.

The Bristol Skills Framework enables our students to recognise their development in academic writing, problem solving, group work, and individual and group presenting. We will equip you with the tools to market your skills, your achievement and your potential in whatever career path you choose to pursue after you graduate.

The University of Bristol has one of the best employment records in the UK. We are rated sixth in the UK in the QS Graduate Employability Rankings 2018 and are the fourth most targeted university by top UK graduate employers (High Fliers Research 2018).
