ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In the process of compiling and editing the information on Bristol trading voyages to Africa contained in this volume I have been fortunate to receive assistance and encouragement from a number of groups and individuals. The task of collecting the material was made much easier from the outset by the generous help and advice given to me by the staffs of the Public Record Office, the Bristol Record Office, the Bristol Central Library and the Bristol Society of Merchant Venturers. I am grateful to the Society of Merchant Venturers for permission to consult its records and to use material from them. My thanks are due also to the British Academy for its generosity in providing me with a grant in order to allow me to complete my research on Bristol voyages to Africa. Finally I am indebted to Miss Mary Williams, former City Archivist in Bristol, and Professor Patrick McGrath, the General Editor of the Bristol Record Society, for their warm response to my initial proposal for this volume and for their guidance and help in bringing it to fruition.
INTRODUCTION

Within thirty years of the opening of the British slave trade in 1698 to private traders Bristol succeeded in wresting from London the position of Britain’s leading port in the African trade. As was made clear in an introduction to an earlier volume in this series, Bristol’s rise to ascendancy by 1730 was due in part to the faltering of London’s participation in the trade. But it was attributable also to a substantial increase in Bristol’s own investment in African commerce, a fact reflected in the growth in the port’s clearances to Africa from under 5 ships per year in the period immediately after 1698 to over 40 a year in the late 1720s.

The advantage achieved by Bristol in the African trade by 1730 largely persisted until the early 1740s when ascendancy in the trade passed finally and permanently to Liverpool. In only 6 of the 16 years covered by this volume were Bristol vessels in the African trade apparently outnumbered by vessels from any other single British port. London appears to have dispatched more vessels to Africa than Bristol in 1733 and 1736, while clearances from Liverpool to Africa outstripped those from Bristol for the first time in 1739, again in 1742, and persistently from 1744 onwards. Effectively therefore Bristol lost supremacy in British trade to Africa after 1743. Nevertheless, during the 16 years beginning in 1730 Bristol merchants were responsible for over 40 per cent of British voyages to Africa, fitting out on average 36 ventures a year or almost 550 during the whole period. By comparison, clearances from Liverpool to Africa during these 16 years totalled 389, while clearances from London totalled 335.¹

In the remaining sections of this introduction I propose, firstly, to describe the major sources of evidence available for tracing Bristol voyages to Africa between 1730 and 1745 and to assess the reliability of the data they yield, and secondly, to outline the major features of Bristol’s trade to Africa in this period, including the fluctuations in the trade, its distribution in West Africa, and the pattern of slave sales in America by the port’s ships.

I. SOURCES AND METHODOLOGY

The historian investigating Bristol’s trade to Africa in the period from ¹ Information on Liverpool and London clearances to Africa may be found in P.R.O. Admiralty series, ADM 7/77 onwards, and in P.R.O. Treasury papers, T 64/276A and T 70/1205.
1730 to 1745 is faced, as in earlier years, with a paucity of business letters and accounts. Apart from a few scraps of correspondence of Isaac Hobhouse, no body of private correspondence of any of Bristol’s African merchants has in fact survived for these years. As with the period before 1730, therefore, we are obliged to rely primarily on official trade and shipping records in order to trace Bristol voyages to Africa between 1730 and 1745. Information from official sources may be supplemented from 1741 onwards by data gleaned from Bristol newspapers and Lloyds Lists.

Among the British ports involved in the African trade Bristol is particularly well served by the availability of official trade and shipping records. These records are sufficiently full that it is possible to trace virtually all the ships that embarked at Bristol on voyages to Africa from 1730 to 1745, and, in many instances, to establish their individual voyage patterns. A few Bristol ships may have cleared for Africa from ports other than their home port in this period, but no systematic attempt has been made to trace them. Those that have been detected are listed in this volume but the number escaping detection is unknown. There is no evidence, however, that Bristol-owned vessels were fitted out for voyages to Africa at other British ports in this period, while the surviving colonial office records suggest that very few Bristol ships cleared for Africa from colonial ports. The voyages included in this volume appear, therefore, to encompass virtually the whole of Bristol’s dealings with Africa between 1730 and 1745.

The basic source of information about Bristol ships trading to Africa between 1730 and 1745 is, as in the years down to 1730, the Exchequer K.R. Port Books (P.R.O. Series E 190). The series comprises both overseas outward and inward books. A record of goods exported from and imported into Bristol, the Port Books provide information about the names of ships and their masters, the goods laden or discharged, the dates of loading or unloading, and the merchants responsible for the goods. They also indicate in the case of outward books the intended first port of call abroad of vessels, and in the case of inward books their last port of loading abroad. Outward books have survived for most years in this period, though the books for 1740 and 1743–45 are missing and those for 1736 and 1738 were unfit for use. Even larger gaps exist in the inward series of Port Books, with books being either missing or unfit for use in each year, except 1742, from 1736 onwards.

Information similar to some of that provided by the Port Books is obtainable from other sources, and can be used to supplement that contained in the Port Books or to compensate for gaps in the latter. The sources available include newspapers such as the Bristol Oracle and County Advertiser and Lloyds Lists, as well as the Wharfage Books housed at the Merchant Venturers Hall, Bristol and the Mediterranean Passes (P.R.O. Admiralty Series, ADM 7/77 onwards). There are scattered editions of the Bristol Oracle and Lloyds Lists from 1741 onwards at the Bristol Central Library and the Guildhall Library, London, respectively; these offer evidence about dates of departure and return of vessels at Bristol and some details of their voyages abroad. The Wharfage Books arose from the collection of wharfage duties by the Society of Merchant Venturers at Bristol, and have survived in a more or less continuous series from 1727 to the end of the eighteenth century. Primarily a record of produce unloaded at Bristol, the books give details about the dates of arrival of vessels at Bristol, their tonnage and their last port of call.

Registers of Mediterranean Passes date from 1662 but have survived for the eighteenth century only from 1729 onwards. The issuing of passes by the Admiralty arose from treaties signed by the British authorities with the various corsair city-states of the Barbary Coast of North Africa in the second half of the seventeenth century. Passes were intended to offer protection to British vessels against attack by the corsairs. Vessels journeying into the Mediterranean were naturally often issued with passes, but passes were also taken out by shipowners whose vessels were expected to sail in the course of their trading ventures through waters frequented by Barbary corsairs. Vessels travelling to Africa from Bristol and other British ports naturally fell into the latter group, and the indications are that a very high proportion of such vessels, normally 90 per cent or more, were usually issued with Mediterranean Passes before embarking on their voyages to the African coast.

The information provided by the surviving registers of passes varies over time but almost invariably includes the dates of issue and return of passes, the names of vessels to which passes were issued and their masters, and the intended first (and in some cases, subsequent) destination of vessels overseas. In addition, details are given about the vessels themselves, including their port of ownership, place of construction, tonnage, and numbers of guns and crew. Registers of Mediterranean Passes are thus a major source of data about the ships involved in Bristol's trade to Africa from 1729 onwards.

As in the period before 1729, however, the most detailed evidence about the characteristics of Bristol vessels trading to Africa is to be found in the Colonial Naval Office Shipping Lists (P.R.O. CO series). Information contained in the Naval Office lists varies over time and from one colony to another, but in most instances they provide data about the tonnage, guns, crew size, and owners of vessels, as well as the dates and place of their construction and registration. They also indicate the dates of entry and clearance of vessels at colonial ports, the goods they carried (including numbers of slaves), and the origins or proposed destination of goods. Vessels importing slaves directly from the African coast are normally recorded as entering a colonial port from Africa but occasionally more specific coastal origins of the slaves imported are given. The Naval Office lists are valuable therefore for investigating the nature of Bristol slave ships and their pattern of trading activity abroad.

Unfortunately the survival rate of Naval Office lists for each of the major slave-importing colonies in British America between 1730 and 1745 is variable. With regard to the southern mainland colonies, no lists have apparently survived for this period for Maryland. However, lists for Virginia are largely complete while lists are also available for South Carolina for most years. Gaps in the Naval Office lists for the West Indian islands are much more substantial than for the mainland colonies in this period. No lists have apparently survived for any of the four Leeward Islands of Antigua, Montserrat, Nevis and St Kitts, while lists for Jamaica are available only from 1741 onwards. Lists for Barbados are available for most years in the 1730s but are missing after 1738.

The low survival rate of Naval Office lists means that only 30 per cent of the ships that left Bristol on slaving ventures between 1730 and 1745 are traceable in the surviving lists. Other records allow one, however, to cover some of the gaps in our information about Bristol slaving voyages in these years left by the missing Naval Office lists. Data on ships’ tonnages, armaments and crews are to be found, as noted earlier, in registers of Mediterranean Passes or Wharfage Books. The latter, together with inward Port Books, newspapers and Lloyds Lists, also allow one to establish the probable markets in America that most Bristol slave ships supplied. Finally, information relating to the date of arrival of Bristol slave ships in colonial ports, the numbers of slaves they imported, the African origins of the slaves, and the colonial merchants or factors to whom they were consigned for sale may be obtained from various other sources, notably Treasurers accounts for Barbados in 1730–36 and for South Carolina from 1735 onwards and the advertisements for sales of slaves imported into South Carolina after 1733 published by Elizabeth Donnan and gleaned from the South Carolina Gazette.6 Used in conjunction with Naval Office lists, such sources allow one to trace the markets in British America to which 92 per cent of the Bristol slave ships included in this volume delivered their slaves. It is also possible to trace the coastal origins in Africa of some 20 per cent of the slave cargoes shipped by Bristol vessels in this period.

The method adopted here for summarising the data relating to Bristol vessels and their voyages to Africa and America is, as in the previous volume, to list vessels alphabetically according to the year in which they embarked on their voyage to the African coast. Information about each voyage is itemised under 14 separate headings, as follows:

(1) The tonnage and armament of the vessel
(2) The size of the vessel’s crew, either outwards from Bristol, on its return to the port, or otherwise specified
(3) The place and year of construction of the vessel
(4) The place and date of its registration
(5) The master of the vessel
(6) The owner(s) of the vessel
(7) The vessel’s date of departure from Bristol or other (named) port
(8) The vessel’s known place or places of trade in Africa
(9) The number or intended (*) number of slaves shipped in Africa
(10) The port or ports of arrival of the vessel in America
(11) The vessel’s date(s) of arrival at the port(s) in America
(12) The number of slaves delivered or sold at the port(s) in America
(13) The date of departure of the vessel from its last port of call in America
(14) The date of the vessel’s return to Bristol or other known conclusion to the voyage.

A lack of information about a vessel or its voyage under any of these 14 headings is signalled by a blank entry, except for heading (8) where a blank entry indicates that the vessel’s trading location on the coast was referred to simply as ‘Africa’. Where there is information about the dates of departure or return of vessels at Bristol and the dates of issue and return of Mediterranean Passes, the latter is given in brackets under headings (7) and (14) respectively. In addition, where the sources consulted offer different information for a particular heading (e.g. the tonnage of a vessel or the name of the master), I have generally preferred the data provided by the Port Books and the Naval Office lists to that given in other sources. However, because the information supplied by the other sources may be significant in some instances, it is included in brackets under the appropriate heading. Finally, information given to clarify evidence from contemporary sources or which lacks proper documentary support is entered in square brackets.
Evidence about Bristol voyages to Africa which falls outside the above headings but which is nevertheless considered useful is given at the end of each voyage history, together with references to each of the sources consulted. Although the amount of supplementary evidence available for some voyages in this period is quite large, it is overall relatively slender. There is, for instance, hardly any information about the value of vessels or their outfits, the numbers of slaves shipped in Africa, or the prices of slaves, whether in Africa or the New World. The absence of most of the inward Port Books, particularly after 1735, means, furthermore, that we have relatively little information for this period about the return cargoes of Bristol ships, especially their imports of African produce, while the low survival rate of Naval Office lists deprives us of much evidence about the owners of Bristol slave ships. In general therefore our knowledge about certain aspects of Bristol's trade to Africa, including its coastal distribution in Africa, the ownership of the vessels involved, and the financial outcome of voyages, remains very imperfect in the period covered by this volume.

The reliability of the evidence about Bristol voyages to Africa collected together in this volume is difficult to assess. There is, however, fairly close agreement between most of the sources used regarding certain types of information, notably the tonnages of vessels; the numbers of slaves delivered or sold, and the dates of arrival of vessels in colonial ports or their return to Bristol. The data set out in this volume are thus probably as reliable as one can expect from eighteenth-century records. Nevertheless, some comment is required about two aspects of the data. First, evidence relating to the ownership of vessels under heading (6) and their departure from Bristol under heading (7) derives primarily from the Port Books. Strictly speaking, information given in the Port Books relates to merchants loading goods rather than ownership of vessels and to the dates of loading goods rather than the departure of vessels from Bristol. To infer ownership of vessels or their dates of departure from Bristol from the Port Books may therefore seem questionable, but, as indicated elsewhere, the merchants loading Africa-bound vessels normally owned such vessels while the time that elapsed between completion of loading and sailing for Africa was normally very short. Consequently, it is reasonable to attribute ownership of vessels bound for Africa to the merchants loading them and to use final known dates of loading vessels recorded in the Port Books as close approximations to the actual date of departure of such vessels from Bristol. Second, the data relating to crew size and armaments are supplied principally by the Mediterranean Passes, with additional material drawn from the Naval Office lists. The information about crews and armaments provided by such sources is, however, problematical. In the case of the Mediterranean Passes, the information was recorded at the time that the pass was issued. Comparison of the dates of issue of passes with dates of departure of vessels from Bristol suggests that passes were often issued several days or even weeks before vessels left Bristol for Africa. The information given in the registers of passes thus relates to owners' intentions about the manning or arming of their vessels rather than actual levels of manning or armament at the time of sailing. Evidence from a later period suggests that in most instances the number of crew on board Bristol vessels when they departed for Africa was different from that given in the register; the difference was not systematic, some vessels having larger and others smaller crews than the passes suggested. Despite these frequent variations between proposed and actual crew sizes, the indications are nevertheless that shipowners' intentions about the manning of their vessels as revealed by the passes were on average broadly accurate, with the mean recorded size of crew on Africa-bound Bristol ships given in the registers of passes being only about 5 per cent smaller than the actual crew carried. As a source of information about the crew and, perhaps, armaments on individual Bristol ships bound for Africa, the Mediterranean Passes may be untrustworthy, but they seem to provide a fairly reliable picture of the average numbers of crew and guns employed on large groups of Bristol vessels on their outward voyages to Africa.

7 Some information on shipowners may be found nevertheless in J.W. Damer Powell, Bristol Privateers and Ships of War, Bristol, 1930. It should be noted that ivory imports of less than 15 cwt per ship have not been listed in this volume.

Complementary information relating to the crews and armaments of Bristol slave ships at their time of arrival at or departure from ports in British America is provided by the Naval Office lists. Here again the data given need to be approached cautiously. Close scrutiny of the figures suggests that in some colonies, notably Virginia, the naval officers may have often simply transcribed data on crew size and armaments given in the Mediterranean Passes. As far as armaments were concerned, this may have been justified, but the slave trade was a notorious graveyard for British seamen, and it was unlikely that more than a very small number of Bristol slave ships succeeded in reaching America without loss of crew. One needs to view with some scepticism therefore the reliability of data on crews entering colonial ports on Bristol slave ships, particularly when the recorded number of crew is identical with that given in the registers of Mediterranean Passes.

II. BRISTOL AND THE AFRICAN TRADE, 1730–1745

Between 1730 and 1745 Bristol was the premier British port trading to Africa. However, the level of its involvement in the trade varied substantially during the period. The number of ships clearing Bristol for Africa stood at over 45 a year in 1730-32 and 1737-38, but fell to 16 in 1745 and 8 in 1744, and averaged between 25 and 37 in other years. According to Walter Lougher, a prominent Bristol slave merchant, the decline in the port's involvement in the African trade after 1738 was largely due to the outbreak of war with Spain in 1739 and its extension to France in 1743; in Lougher's view the war with France was particularly damaging, causing in the absence of naval protection for Bristol ships on the African coast such a sharp rise in insurance costs 'that the Trade could not Support it'.

The impact of war on Bristol clearances to Africa after 1738 was similar to that on London clearances, but not, significantly, on Liverpool clearances; clearances from Liverpool to Africa remained throughout the 1740s more buoyant than from the southern ports, never falling below 20 a year and averaging over 30 a year. The Anglo-French war that began in 1743 thus seems to have been a major watershed in the history of eighteenth-century British trade to Africa, promoting the transfer of control over British trade with this area from Bristol to Liverpool.

Why Liverpool was able to sustain a higher level of participation in the African trade after 1738 than Bristol is an issue that requires further research. It is clear, however, that, although the war with Spain and France was the immediate cause of Bristol's loss of ascendancy in British slaving, there were other factors involved too. Throughout the 1730s Bristol failed to achieve the level of dominance in the African trade that London exerted before 1720 or Liverpool attained throughout the second half of the eighteenth century. Particularly striking was the slump in Bristol's clearances to Africa between 1733 and 1737. While Bristol remained the leading British port in the African trade in these years, Liverpool clearances to Africa continued to expand in this period as Bristol's share of the trade among the three major British slave-trading ports fell to below 40 per cent. Rising competition from Liverpool was therefore a substantial threat to Bristol's ascendancy in British trade to Africa throughout the 1730s.

A thorough investigation of Bristol's failure to sustain its leadership in British trade to Africa is beyond the scope of this introduction, for it requires detailed analysis of Liverpool's competitive strengths as well as Bristol's weaknesses. It is useful, however, to explore some of the basic features of Bristol's trade to Africa during its short period of ascendancy and to indicate some of the problems that confronted Bristol traders in these years.

In certain respects Bristol's trade to Africa between 1730 and 1745 followed the pattern established in the years before 1730. To begin with, in their pursuit of African trade, Bristol merchants continued to be interested primarily in slaves, their interest in African products such as ivory and redwood being essentially subordinate to this. Thus of the 550 Bristol voyages to Africa documented in this volume, fewer than 15 (or 4 per cent) were associated with the bilateral or direct trade in African produce. Slave ships did, of course, purchase quantities of African produce in the course of their dealings on the coast, and in some cases the quantities of goods procured were substantial. The Hayman, for instance, returned to Bristol in April 1731 from a slaving voyage to Angola and Jamaica with over 29 tons of redwood, while in the same year the Diana returned from its slaving voyage to the Bight of Benin and Jamaica with over 31 cwt of ivory. Purchases of African produce on this scale doubtless made a useful contribution to the financial outcome of slaving voyages; but purchases of produce by most Bristol slave ships between 1730 and 1745 were clearly much smaller than those of the Hayman and Diana. For the great majority of Bristol investors in African voyages after 1730 the financial returns on their investments depended very largely upon the state of the trade in slaves.

Throughout the 1730s the slave trade continued to attract large amounts of Bristol capital. At the peak of the port's involvement in slaving in 1730–32 and 1737–38, the sums invested were probably close to £200,000 annually; over the decade as a whole they perhaps averaged nearly £160,000 annually. Evidence presented in an earlier volume suggests that from the beginning of Bristol's regular involvement in the African trade a relatively small group of merchants played a vital role in mobilising capital for African ventures and organising voyages. The evidence presented in this volume reveals a similar picture in the decade and a half after 1730. Altogether some 20 Bristol merchants dominated the port's trade to Africa in this period, though the importance of particular individuals changed over time. They included some long-established African merchants such as James Day, Richard Henvill and William Jefferis as well as more recent entrants into the trade such as Henry Dampier, James Laroche, Walter Lougher and Henry Tonge. Some, like James Day and Henry Dampier, were evidently related by marriage and most had been born into or acquired through marriage and apprenticeship close connections with prominent local merchant families. They were able therefore to invest substantially in the trade in their own right, and through their reputation and connections to encourage others to invest in it too. Furthermore, some merchants, like James Laroche, had family ties with London, an important source of trade goods for Africa, while others had, it seems, kinship and other ties with merchants residing in colonial ports.\textsuperscript{15} The latter advised Bristol merchants about the market prospects for slaves in America and often acted as factors or commission agents for the sale of cargoes of slaves delivered by Bristol ships to America.

Despite the large scale of Bristol's commerce to Africa by 1730 it is unlikely that any of the port's leading African traders specialised purely in the slave trade. Nor, it seems, did many concentrate within slaving itself upon particular trading centres in West Africa or slave-purchasing colonies in America; most preferred instead to buy or sell slaves in the most promising market available. There are some signs, however, that a few merchants tended to favour trade with specific African regions or American markets. For example, James Laroche, the largest Bristol slave trader in this period, seems to have fitted out a relatively large share of Bristol's known ventures to Angola during the 1730s while Walter Lougher revealed quite a discernible penchant for trading in the Niger Delta. Similarly, in choosing markets in America in which to sell slaves, Henry Tonge almost invariably directed his vessels to Jamaica while Joseph Ilies demonstrated a clear preference for selling his cargoes of slaves at South Carolina. In the New World at least, such differences in market preferences among Bristol traders probably reflected the varying strength of their ties with particular colonies and the nature of their cognate interests in colonial trade. In the case of West Africa, the preferences of Bristol merchants for particular trading regions are more difficult to explain, but recent research has suggested that significant inter-regional differences existed in patterns of commodity exchange and business practices generally at the coast, and these, together with possible commercial ties with local African dealers in slaves, may have encouraged some variation among Bristol merchants in the coastal distribution of their slaving activities in West Africa.\textsuperscript{16}

The impact of changes in the composition of Bristol's African trading elite and differences in the trading habits between members of that elite upon the overall pattern of Bristol's slave trade in West Africa and America is difficult to judge. As with the period before \textsuperscript{15} East India goods, notably textiles, were consistently the most important foreign-produced goods exported from Bristol to Africa in the eighteenth century and were naturally obtained through the London office of the East India Company.

1730, evidence about the distribution of Bristol’s trade in West Africa between 1730 and 1745 is very imperfect, while information about the pattern of slave sales in America, although much fuller, remains incomplete. Nevertheless, some data relating to the distribution of Bristol trade in Africa in the 1730s and 1740s are available. Naval Office lists, newspapers and Treasurers’ accounts have yielded information about the African origins of some 135 cargoes of slaves shipped by Bristol vessels between 1730 and 1745. Of these cargoes, 26 were reported as originating from Guinea, a term often used as a synonym for Africa but sometimes more narrowly defined as the area between the Gambia and the Bight of Benin. 17 Of the remaining 109 shiploads of slaves, 56 were reported as arriving in America from ports such as Bonny and Old Calabar in the Bight of Biafra, 27 from Angola, 12 from the Gold Coast or Anamaboe, 7 from Gambia, 6 from Sierra Leone or the Windward Coast, and one from Benin. On the basis of this self-selected sample of 109 cargoes, which comprises some 20 per cent of all Bristol slaving voyages between 1730 and 1745, it appears that ports in the Bight of Biafra, as in earlier years, remained the largest single source of slave cargoes for Bristol vessels during the 1730s and early 1740s. 18 Closer comparison of these figures with those for earlier years suggests, however, that the Bight of Biafra’s share of Bristol’s slave exports from Africa declined after 1730 as Angola emerged as an important supplier of slaves to Bristol ships. It also seems that the areas of slave supply between the Gambia and the Bight of Benin favoured by the Royal African Company in the late seventeenth century continued to attract a relatively small proportion of Bristol traders in the 1730s and early 1740s, though it is possible that some of the vessels reported as arriving in America from Guinea may have obtained their cargoes from these areas.

Conclusions based on such a small number of shiploads of slaves may be thought to be unreliable. This is particularly so when, as here, most of the cargoes of slaves in the sample were delivered to the mainland colonies of South Carolina and Virginia, colonies which were described by one observer in 1749 as requiring ‘no Gold Coast Slaves’. 19 Our sample may naturally understate therefore the importance of the Gold Coast at least as a source of Bristol slave exports from Africa in the 1730s and 1740s. This view is endorsed to some extent by contemporary observers of the trade. Thus an unsigned memorandum sent to the Bristol M.P., Edward Southwell, probably in 1743 or 1744, suggested that Bristol’s ‘market for slaves [was] at Anamaboe and [the] Angola Coast’. 20 Similarly, another observer claimed in December 1744 that 'before the French resorted in such great Numbers to Annamaboe, near half the Ships from Bristol purchased their whole Complements of Negroes on the Windward & Gold Coasts', but that dealings with these areas had now 'declined to about one fourth part of their Whole Trade'.

Comments made against a background of diminished trade, French competition and wartime disruptions to commerce have to be regarded with some scepticism. Nevertheless a detailed breakdown of Bristol's trade with Africa in 1749 indicates that the Gold Coast and Windward Coast were significant suppliers of slaves to the port's ships. The account suggests that of the 47 ships from Bristol involved in the slave trade in 1749, 17 ships capable of carrying 5,180 slaves were bound for the Gold Coast and Windward Coast; 23 ships (8,110 slaves) for the Bight of Benin, Bonny and Calabar; and 7 ships (3,350 slaves) for Angola.

Confirming the importance of the Bight of Biafra and Angola as sources of supply of slaves to Bristol vessels revealed by our earlier voyage sample, this 1749 account also indicates that the Windward Coast and Gold Coast were perhaps more significant contributors of slaves to Bristol ships in the 1730s and 1740s than that sample suggests.

Signs of some shift in the coastal distribution of Bristol's trade in Africa after 1730, notably the expansion of trade at Angola, are matched by more positive evidence of changes in the pattern of slave sales in America by Bristol ships during the same period. As indicated earlier, information is available about the probable markets in America for over 90 per cent of the cargoes of slaves delivered to the New World by Bristol ships in 1730–45. All the major markets for slaves in British America were served by Bristol ships in these years, but the general distribution of Bristol slave sales was marked by concentration upon four markets: Jamaica, St Kitts, South Carolina, and Virginia. Together these four colonies took some 427 or 88 per cent of the cargoes of slaves known to have reached America in Bristol vessels in the years covered by this volume. Of these 427 cargoes, 245 were sold at Jamaica, 65 at Virginia, 61 at St Kitts, and 56 at South Carolina. The remaining 57 cargoes were sold very largely in the British West Indies, 34 being delivered to Barbados, 11 to Antigua, 2 each to Montserrat and Nevis, and the other 8 to Maryland.

As with the three decades after 1698, Jamaica and its fellow Caribbean islands dominated the Bristol slave trade in the New World between 1730 and 1745; Jamaica alone took just over half of Bristol’s slave cargoes in these years, and the British Caribbean islands combined almost three-quarters of the port's cargoes. Two other aspects of Bristol's slave trade in America also deserve emphasis. First, Bristol merchants continued after 1730 to supply substantial numbers of slaves to mainland colonies such as South Carolina and Virginia, thereby maintaining the strong slave-trading links with these colonies that they had forged in the two decades before 1730. Second, the merchants of Bristol were apparently responsible for a high proportion of the total slave sales in most of the markets upon which they concentrated. Available evidence suggests that Bristol ships accounted for over half of all the cargoes of slaves delivered to Jamaica between 1730 and 1745, and Bristol merchants' share of slave deliveries to other markets on which they concentrated, notably Virginia and South Carolina, seems to have been equally large.23

There were, nevertheless, shifts after 1730 in the relative importance of certain markets for Bristol slave ships in the Caribbean and North America in comparison with earlier years. Within the Caribbean, the most striking development was Barbados' decline as a market for Bristol slavers and its replacement, particularly from 1735 onwards, by St Kitts. Sales of slaves by Bristol ships to the other Leeward Islands remained relatively modest, however, with trade to the smaller islands of Montserrat and Nevis in particular falling away significantly. As for North America, South Carolina emerged as the most rapidly growing market for Bristol slave merchants after 1730, outstripping Virginia as a destination for Bristol slave ships during the 1730s and failing to overshadow the Chesapeake colony throughout the whole period from 1730 to 1745 only because of the prohibitive duty on slave sales in South Carolina in 1740–42.24 As in earlier years, Maryland remained a relatively minor destination for Bristol slave ships after 1730, though the number of slave cargoes sold in the colony by Bristol traders rose noticeably. Despite the continuing marginality of Maryland as a market for Bristol slave merchants, the proportion of their slave cargoes that Bristol traders directed to the three major mainland slave colonies rose moderately after 1730, increasing from 21 per cent in 1698–1729 to 27 per cent in 1730–45.

Limitations of space preclude a detailed investigation of the causes of these changes in American markets for Bristol slave ships. The level of Bristol slave sales in most colonies was, however, influenced by trends in either the output of agricultural staples or the prices planters received for their crops in European, notably British, markets. Thus, the increased scale of Bristol slave deliveries to South Carolina during the 1730s reflected the colony's expanding production and export of rice in these years, while Barbados' decline as a market for Bristol slave merchants mirrored the slump in the island's exports of sugar during the same period.\(^{25}\) Available figures on British sugar imports fail to show any significant upward trend after 1730 in sugar production at either St Kitts or Jamaica, Bristol merchants' largest Caribbean markets for slaves in these years. Evidence on the price of muscovado sugar at London suggests nevertheless that the years of heaviest slave delivery by Bristol merchants to St Kitts — 1737–39 and 1743–44 — coincided with noticeable upturns in London sugar prices and perhaps therefore in the incomes of the island's planters.\(^{26}\) Similar increases occurred in Bristol slave deliveries to Jamaica after 1737, though closer inspection of the port's slave trade reveals that the peak of Bristol slave shipments to the colony occurred earlier in the decade in 1730–33, when, significantly, sugar prices were much lower, falling in fact at London to their lowest point during the whole eighteenth century.

The scale of Bristol's trade with Jamaica in the early 1730s reminds one that factors other than planters' incomes from agricultural staples helped to determine the demand for slaves in British America. Demand for slaves in Spanish America was particularly significant in shaping the level and distribution of Bristol slave sales during the 1730s and early 1740s. In meeting this demand Jamaica was vital, acting as the trans-shipment centre for many of the slaves supplied by British traders in general to Spanish America. Recent research has shown that 231 (or almost 60 per cent) of the 390 ships known to have supplied slaves to Spanish America between 1715 and 1738 under the Asiento Treaty between Britain and Spain set out from Jamaica, and that a further 72 (or 19 per cent) set out from Barbados and St Kitts.\(^{27}\) The precise number of slaves shipped to Spanish territories from Jamaica is impossible to ascertain, but figures presented by Stephen Fuller, agent for the island, to the Board of Trade in 1778 indicate that slave re-exports from Jamaica, mainly, it seems, to Spanish America, averaged over 1,600 slaves per year between 1730 and 1745, and were equivalent to some 30 per cent of annual imports into the colony during the same period.\(^{28}\) The level of slave re-exports and their consequent ratio to imports was, however, very unsteady, ranging from over 5,300 slaves a year (or over 50 per cent of imports) in 1730–33 to around 550 slaves a year (or under 10 per cent of imports) in 1739–40. The fact that Bristol's slave trade to Jamaica peaked in the early 1730s when sugar prices in Britain were extremely low suggests that the buoyancy of Jamaica's re-export trade in slaves to Spanish America was a major factor in sustaining Bristol's high level of involvement in the African trade in 1730–32. The available data do not allow one to make an exact calculation of the importance of the Spanish American market to Bristol slave merchants at this time. Crude estimates suggest nevertheless that it was significant, taking ultimately perhaps as many as a third of all the slaves delivered by Bristol ships to the New World in the early 1730s.

The shifting pattern of Bristol's slave sales in the New World in the decade and a half after 1730, with its heavy focus on Jamaica, South Carolina, Virginia and, after 1737, St Kitts, may be seen as confirmation of the reliability of Bristol merchants' knowledge of slave markets in British America during this period. The market prospects for slaves remained difficult to judge, however, as changing political conditions, both within the colonies and in the international sphere, combined with fluctuations in the output and price of agricultural staples to produce sudden alterations in the demand for slaves in certain colonies. Slave sales in South Carolina, for instance, were disrupted by currency disputes in the colony during the 1730s, notably in 1731 and 1736, and were brought to a complete halt in 1740–42 by prohibitive duties on slave imports after the Stono Rebellion in 1739. Political factors, notably the state of Anglo-Spanish relations, had an even greater effect on the market prospects for slaves at Jamaica. The general deterioration of such relations, beginning in the mid-1730s and culminating in the outbreak of war in 1739, led to a substantial decline in slave re-exports from the island from 1734 onwards and a consequent sharp fall in slave imports. Politics and fluctuations in markets for colonial staples thus made the 1730s and early 1740s a period of great uncertainty for Bristol merchants in marketing their slaves, and largely explain the varying levels of their investment in the African trade even during their period of ascendancy in the business. The voyage data presented in this volume suggest that difficulties in procuring slaves in Africa may have exacerbated the problems facing Bristol merchants after 1730. As indicated earlier, evidence about the numbers of slaves purchased by Bristol merchants in Africa in 1730–1745 is almost non-existent. Nevertheless the available data on 29 This estimate assumes that two-thirds of Bristol ships landed their slaves at Jamaica in these years and that half of Jamaica's slave imports were later re-exported to Spanish America. The indications are that the Spanish trade was also important in 1729–30.

voyage times and slave deliveries do suggest that, in comparison with the immediately preceding years, Bristol merchants experienced greater difficulty in procuring slaves in West Africa after 1730. Thus data presented in an earlier volume indicate that in 1725–29 Bristol slave ships reached America on average around 220 days after leaving their home port and delivered some 225 slaves on average; the mean delivery rate of slaves by Bristol ships in these years was therefore approximately one slave per voyage day. By comparison average sailing times rose to 269 days in 1730–34 while the average number of slaves delivered per ship fell to around 210, yielding a mean delivery rate of 0.8 slaves per day or 20 per cent lower than in the late 1720s. Mean delivery rates recovered to 0.9 slaves after 1735 as average sailing times fell slightly and average numbers of slaves delivered rose to over 230 per ship but they still remained noticeably lower than those prevailing a decade earlier.

Various factors could conceivably have contributed to an explanation of the deterioration in average slave delivery rates by Bristol ships around 1730; they include shifts in the coastal distribution of Bristol trade in Africa and increased slave mortality levels in the Atlantic crossing. Although data on slave mortality on Bristol ships in this period are lacking, it seems unlikely that either mortality levels of slaves or the coastal distribution of Bristol trade changed sufficiently in these years to account for all or even a large part of the decline in slave delivery rates revealed by the voyage data. It seems therefore that changes in such rates stemmed primarily from deteriorating slave supply conditions in West Africa. Apart from the indirect indicators provided by voyage data, specific evidence about slave supply conditions on the African coast at this time is slender. The Jamaican slave factors, Tyndall & Assheton, anticipated difficulties in slave supply in March 1729, however, as they wrote to Isaac Hobhouse of Bristol that trade at the Bight of Biafra, a popular trading region among Bristol merchants, ‘must be overdone, as we fear a Little time will discover’. Evidence about the price of slaves at the coast is also revealing. Unfortunately information about the prices paid for slaves by Bristol merchants in West Africa is almost non-existent for this period but price data collected by Richard Bean indicate that the average price of adult male slaves in West Africa rose from just under £13 per head in 1728–32, to over £15 in 1733–37, and to over £17 in 1738–42. Based on relatively small samples of prices, Bean’s figures need to be used cautiously. They are nevertheless broadly consistent with the deterioration in slave supply conditions in West Africa indicated by Bristol voyage data.

31 Bristol Central Library, Hobhouse papers, 13 March 1729, Tyndall & Assheton to Isaac Hobhouse.
The importance of the problems that Bristol merchants evidently experienced to procuring slaves in West Africa in the early 1730s becomes apparent when one examines trends in slave prices in British America during the same years. Price data relating specifically to slave sales by Bristol traders are again very scarce for this period, but figures compiled by Bean indicate that the mean price of adult male slaves at Jamaica, the central market for Bristol merchants at this time, fell from almost £25 per head in 1728–32 to £18.5 in 1733–37, before rising to £26.6 in 1738–42. As with his African prices, Bean’s price series for slaves in America is based on very small samples of data. The undulations in slave prices in America suggested by his series tend nevertheless to vary broadly in accordance with known changes in prices of agricultural staples such as sugar and levels of slave shipment from Jamaica to Spanish America. Assuming therefore that Bean’s series offers a reasonably reliable indicator of general movements of slave prices in Jamaica and, given the island’s importance, perhaps British America as a whole, it would seem that, because of changing market conditions for slaves in both Africa and America, Bristol merchants were confronted in the mid-1730s with a severe squeeze on the price differential for slaves that normally prevailed between the two continents. According to Bean’s figures, these slave price differentials ranged from £12 to £20 or more during most of the eighteenth century, but fell to around £9 in 1738–42 and to £3 in 1733–37. The small size of Bean’s data base requires one to regard the narrowness of the price differential in 1733–37 with some scepticism. Furthermore, the absence of merchants’ accounts and papers makes it difficult to assess the impact of such a substantial decline in inter-continental price differentials upon the profitability of slaving in the 1730s. Contemporaries believed, however, that transport costs of slaves from Africa to America averaged about £7 per head in these years. It appears, therefore, on the basis of known slave prices and transport costs, that Bristol merchants must have struggled to make profits from the slave trade in the 1730s, particularly 1733–37, when, significantly, Bristol investment in the African trade fell sharply. At the very moment then that they attained ascendency in British trade to Africa in the early 1730s Bristol merchants seem to have encountered one of the most acute peacetime crises of profitability in British slave trading during the eighteenth century.

The years of Bristol’s ascendency in the British African trade in the 1730s and early 1740s were by no means a trouble-free period for the port’s African merchants. War clearly created major problems for the port’s merchants after 1738. There are also strong signs that they faced difficulties in years of peace. In particular, a major slump in Bristol clearances to Africa occurred in 1733–36 as changing trading conditions in Africa and the New World evidently combined to put pressure on profit margins in the slave trade. Bristol merchants were not the only group of British traders to Africa to suffer problems in the mid-1730s for clearance data suggest that London merchants too may have found profit-making in the African trade difficult in these years.35 Significantly, however, clearances from Liverpool to Africa continued to mount fairly steadily from 1730 through to 1738, suggesting perhaps that Liverpool merchants were able to adjust more successfully than their Bristol and London counterparts to the problems surrounding the African trade during the 1730s. The reasons for this remain as yet obscure. Nevertheless, from the point of view of the rivalry between Bristol and Liverpool in the slave trade, the fact that Liverpool merchants increased, both absolutely and relatively, their involvement in the African trade during the 1730s must surely be regarded as a powerful indicator that the roots of Liverpool's long-term success in the African slave trade, and the consequent decline of Bristol, lay in more than simply the outbreak of war in 1739.

NOTE ON TRANSCRIPTION

No effort has been made to standardise names, whether of people or ships, in this volume. Names are reproduced as far as possible as they appear in the sources used. Where the spelling of names associated with a particular voyage differs from one source to another, I have generally preferred the spelling in the Port Books to that given in other sources. Entries included without clear documentary evidence to support them are contained in square brackets, while doubts about the accuracy of any information given are signified by (?). References to duty payments at South Carolina are in local currency; it should be noted that £1 sterling exchanged for about £7 currency in South Carolina during most of this period (see J.J. McCusker, Money and Exchange in Europe and America, 1600–1775, London, 1978, pp. 222–224).

Reported to have had 25 slaves on board at Galinas in early November 1730.

The vessel's imports into Bristol included over 31\(\frac{1}{2}\) cwt of ivory.

The vessel was reported with 227 slaves at Barbados but there is no record of it delivering slaves to the island on this voyage; it seems that all its slaves were delivered to Jamaica. Its imports into Bristol included 7 tons 18 cwt of redwood and 2\(\frac{1}{2}\) cwt of cowries returned for lack of sale.

The vessel is recorded as having delivered 340 slaves to Barbados on 9 December 1730 and a further 5 on 13 January 1731. According to the accounts of the sale of the slaves by Charles Withers and Thomas Harrison, 335 slaves were sold and realised £5,746.18s.2½d. net in Barbados currency, or approximately £4,257 sterling. An apparently incomplete list of the slaves sold indicates that 141 were men, 75 women, 65 boys, and 48 girls.

The vessel apparently left only 37 of its slaves at Barbados where they were accepted for sale by Morris & Co.; the rest were presumably shipped to Virginia. The other owners of the vessel were named as Christopher Jones, William Barrow, Joseph and John Alloway, William Hayman, Joseph Devonshire, and Stephen Baker. Its imports into Bristol included over 23½ cwt of ivory.

Bound outwards for Cork and Africa, the vessel reached Barbados with 179 slaves according to the Naval Officers lists. It left apparently 41 slaves at the island to be sold by Blower & Cogan and delivered 130 to Virginia; eight slaves are unaccounted for. Other owners of the vessel included Isaac Hobhouse, Gregory Salter, Richard Maylor, and Thomas Quircke. The Wharfage book mistakenly reports the vessel as returning to Bristol from Jamaica.

MARY 1731/34

(5) Robert Bibbee (12) About 119
(6) Richard Farr & Co. (13)
(7) 21 July (pass 2 July) (14) 25 August (16 October) 1732

A report from Bibbee at Bonny, dated 2 January 1732, indicated that he had about 260 slaves on board but had encountered great sickness among his crew, having lost his carpenter and 6 other hands. He hoped to sail from 'this unwholesome Place', in about a month. Subsequent reports indicate that the ship had made a 'very sickly Voyage', losing 20 out of its 27 sailors and 141 slaves, including 128 before reaching St Kitts. The ship had had only 'five able Hands' in sailing from St Kitts to Jamaica. It seems that the mate also deserted the ship and that Bibbee himself died soon after the completion of the voyage. The vessel's imports into Bristol included over 21 cwt of ivory, half of it on account of Robert Bibbee deceased.

(6) John Teague & Co. (13) 8 October 1733 from Barbados to St Kitts

The vessel entered with 216 slaves at Barbados; at the island 40 were consigned to Withers & Co. for sale. The remaining 176 slaves were presumably shipped to St Kitts. Walter Jenkins and William Wells were also named as owners of the vessel.

(7) 9 August (pass 8 August) (13) 29 August 1733

The vessel entered Barbados with 250 slaves; 31 were consigned to Noblet Ruddock for sale, the rest shipped to Virginia on 11 May 1733. As 227 were entered at Virginia, it seems that the Naval Officer understated the slaves entering Barbados on 8 May.

Of the 170 slaves entered at Barbados, 71 were apparently consigned to Noblet Ruddock for sale between 1 October and 6 December 1733 and 23 to Anthony Lynch on 10 December. There is no evidence that the remaining 76 slaves were sold at Barbados. Peter Day and George Packer were also named as owners of the vessel.

Richard Hawkesworth and Robert Rogers were also named as owners

The vessel entered Bristol from Jamaica though it cleared from South Carolina for its homeward voyage. Its return cargo largely consisted of sugar, and it is probable that the vessel called at the mainland colony, perhaps in distress, after delivering its slaves to Jamaica. Henry Lloyd was also named as an owner of the vessel.

The Southwell was evidently a bilateral or direct trader to Africa; according to its pass, it was bound for Africa and thence Great Britain. It was reported stranded in the Bristol Channel on its way home and the goods saved from it entered at the warehouse in Bristol. The return of its pass was dated 8 March 1732; I assumed this was a clerical error and should have read 1734. (See also 1733/26).

The vessel was expected to rendezvous with the Union, Williams (see 1733/27) at Angola and to assist the latter in its slave purchases. It was then to trade on its own account, using £386 of goods dispatched to the coast on the Union, at Gabon and Cape Lopez. It was expected to buy African produce and to proceed with its purchases to the merchants, Casamajor, Sympson, Warre & Polier, at Cadiz. The vessel entered Bristol from Africa and Cadiz, its imports including over 46 cwt of ivory and 12½ tons of redwood. Its other owners were named as Matthew Thomas, Lewis Casamajor, Isaac Hobhouse, John Bartlett, and Lyonel Lyde for the executors of Alderman Swymmer.

Richard Morecroft was the agent for the sale of the 37 slaves upon whom import duty was paid at Barbados on 21 June 1735. The vessel arrived at the island with 269 slaves and 6 tons of camwood, but cleared subsequently with part of its inward cargo for Antigua. It is assumed that it carried 232 slaves to the latter colony. Henry Tonge, Thomas Power and William Kennedy were also named as owners of the vessel.

The slaves were reported to be 'proper for the Havanas and Cuba'. The Jamaica agent, John Merewether, proposed to buy some girls 'who are not too much on the Yellow cast' from the cargo, but indicated that 'without a demand for the Havanah we shall take but few of the others, they not being in demand on the Continent, some we shall purchase to reduce the price of the Gold Coast Negroes'.

In a letter from St Kitts dated 7 April 1737, it was reported that some 100 men slaves had jumped overboard from this vessel on 16 March near or at the island. Thirty-three were said to have drowned immediately, while many 'more of them were taken up almost drown'd, some of them died since, but not the Owners Loss, they being sold before any Discovery was made of the Injury the Salt Water had done them'. Bird was hopeful of selling 240 slaves but was uncertain about when he might sail for Bristol, 'there being a great Scarcity of Sugar'. The vessel seems to have cleared eventually for Bristol in late June, powder duty being paid on 28 June 1737.

The vessel’s slaves were consigned for sale at Maryland to Philip Lee & Co., Lee being also naval officer at Potomac district in the colony. The vessel’s entry at Maryland was however the occasion for a dispute between Lee and the naval officer at Patuxent district over the legality of the vessel’s entry procedures to the colony. This appears to have led to the confiscation for a time at least of the vessel’s register by the latter official.

On 29 December 1740 Walter Lougher wrote to Edward Southwell, M.P. for Bristol, complaining that the local customs officer had refused to allow provisions on the King David, 'because there was about 150 bushells of horse beanes, intended for the use of my Negroes, w[i]thout which no ship can pretend to go on that Voyage, it being the food Cheifly to be depended on, I think it exceeding hard, that a Ship & Cargo, of Five thousand pound Value, should be detained for such a Trifle of no consequence, I presume the Legislature, never intended that Trade should be interrupted in this manner'. The last comment was presumably a reference to the embargo on corn exports introduced by Parliament following the bad harvest in Britain in 1740. The vessel's imports into Bristol included 3 tons of redwood and 27 cwt of ivory.

Note: 1. Names of Master of vessels, Merchants, Shipowners, Ships, and slave factors are not listed separately through the index but are collected together under the appropriate head. Masters who were shipowners are indicated by an asterisk. Merchant-shipowners are listed simply as Merchants. Where different ships share the same name they are individually indexed.

2. Where more than one form of a surname appears in the text, the name is given under its more common form, with variations shown in brackets. Only the more common form of first names is given in the index.

3. References to Barbados, Jamaica, South Carolina and Virginia, four of the major slave markets for Bristol Merchants in this period, are given in those instances in the voyage accounts where details of the number of slaves delivered or sold are known.

4. The names Africa and Guinea have not been indexed, as Guinea was frequently used as a synonym for Africa.
