

What is REPROVIDE?

We know that often men are worried about the impact of their abusive behaviour on their female partner or ex-partners, but that it can be difficult to get help to stop behaving this way.

We also know that although there is limited evidence to suggest that group domestic violence prevention programmes work, there is not enough evidence to make sure that local councils will fund these programmes.

We want to test these programmes, so we can see if they really do help men and improve safety for their partners, ex-partners, and for children.

Who is eligible to take part in the study?

We want to recruit men who are:

- Aged 21 or over;
- Who are worried that their own behaviour in relationships with women might be violent or abusive;
- Who can understand English well enough to take part in a group programme

If you don't meet these criteria, but would like to help us in this study, we still would like to talk to you about how best to support men in stopping abusive behaviour.

Who is organising and funding the study?

The Department of Health and Social Care is funding this study through the National Institute for Health Research. The research is carried out by a team of researchers who are based at the University of Bristol.

Is this study well-designed and ethical?

An independent group, a Research Ethics Committee which included healthcare professionals and members of the public, assessed whether the study sufficiently protects participants' safety, rights, wellbeing and dignity. This study has been approved by Oxford B Research Ethics Committee.

What does the study involve?

Because this is a test for whether domestic violence prevention programmes work, men joining the study will be randomly allocated to two groups.

Two thirds will join a programme run by a Splitz a leading provider of domestic abuse support services. This will involve attending a weekly group session for approximately 6 months. There will be two groups running in Bristol, both will run in the evening.

The remaining men will not be offered additional support from us (however they may continue to seek support from other providers), but will still be asked to complete questionnaires. The groups will be decided randomly.

Both groups will be equally valuable in helping us to assess whether domestic violence prevention programmes help men and improve safety for their partners, ex-partners, and for children.

Would others call your behaviour abusive?

Abuse in a relationship can involve a pattern of behaviours, including:

- Physically hurting or threatening to hurt your partner
- Pushing or shoving your partner
- Frightening or intimidating your partner
- Jealous behaviour and checking up on your partner
- Controlling or pressuring them into doing what you want, not what they want
- Calling your partner names, humiliating them or swearing at them
- Punching walls, or throwing things, or damaging property
- Insisting on sex, when you know your partner doesn't want to
- Restraining your partner or stopping them from going out
- Upsetting or scaring your children
- Hurting or threatening to harm pets to make your partner or children do what you want

Abusive behaviour has an impact on the health and wellbeing of those who experience the abuse, and also on those who carry out the abuse.

What happens if I want to take part in the study?

If you get in touch with us, one of our researchers will explain the study to you and send you more information to help you make up your mind.

You will then be asked to come to a meeting with the researcher and a programme co-ordinator from Splitz and you will be asked some questions to assess your eligibility for the programme.

If you are eligible and still want to take part, you'll be asked to complete a questionnaire. At the end of the meeting, you will be randomly allocated to either attend the group programme or to be one of our comparison men.

Whichever group you are in, you will be asked to complete questionnaires at regular intervals over a 12-month period. Gift vouchers will be given as a thank you for each completed questionnaire.
